

Intimate relationships form a small yet structurally complete relational system. Recognition and misrecognition, co-presence and symbolic mediation, joint decision and asymmetries of power, the generation and alienation of value, care and vulnerability, eros and justice: all appear here in highly condensed form, as in a tabletop experiment whose laws govern far larger social systems.

This series studies intimacy as a research instance of generative relational being. Drawing on feminist thought, jurisprudence, Kant and Hegel, structural linguistics, Lacanian psychoanalysis, developmental psychology and neuroscience, the theory of epistemic injustice, and generative justice, it seeks the generative mechanisms and the claims of justice that run through all relational systems.

How we treat those closest to us is our most honest answer to the question of justice.

The source of this series is openly available; readers are invited to read, contest, continue, and rewrite.

SERENDIP COMMONS SOCIETY · TOKYO

